Economic crisis changes patterns of migration in Europe
Prof. Dr Victoria Kamondji elected moderator of CCME

"Christians are migrants by vocation", underlined H.E. Metropolitan Emmanuel of France, President of the Conference of European Churches (CEC) in his statement to the 18th General Assembly of the Churches' Commission for Migrants in Europe (CCME) in Bucharest, Romania, from 16-19 June 2011. "With these words and the meaning they contain, we make the migrant status ours; ... The diversity, of which we are making ourselves the heroes of, has meaning only if we reveal the object, namely the very subject of our faith, the image of God, which he has fashioned himself for us."

The conference at the opening of the CCME Assembly tackled the changes in migration patterns observed as a consequence of the economic crisis. Representatives of the Romanian Office for Immigration and Refugees shared their knowledge on immigration and emigration as well as asylum and refugee protection in Romania. Delegates from the churches in Greece, UK, Hungary and Spain gave testimonies on the effects of migration in their countries, pointing to the shortcomings of politicians to respond appropriately and the rise of populist responses. Countries most affected by the crisis observe an increasing departure of skilled professionals as their prospects have become bleak, while arrivals of persons from regions of conflict in North Africa and the Middle East seeking protection continue to challenge particularly Greece.

"Quite unsurprisingly, the economic crisis has had a significant impact on immigration flows, especially to the traditional migrant-receiving EU countries, where the economic downturn has stifled, and in some cases even reverted, what had once been a seemingly ever-growing stream of immigrants." Arcadio Diaz Tejera of the Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly stated. He underlined that "all in all, we cannot talk about any Europe-wide tendencies." He explained that the crisis had a disproportionate impact on immigrant workers, especially on migrant men and youth, while in some European countries employment of migrant women has gone up, as they have taken up jobs to compensate for loss of income by male family members. "A realistic and responsible discussion on the benefits and costs of migration are in the long-run interest of both states and migrants," he concluded.

CCME Assembly commemorates 60th Anniversary of the International Refugee Convention
